OVERVIEW

This workshop equips participants with the foundational knowledge of international economic law and its major institutions. It helps professionals understand how legal norms and economic power are institutionalized at the global level through bodies like the IMF, World Bank, and WTO. By the end of the course, participants will be able to analyze policy decisions, assess legal instruments, and engage more effectively with the systems that shape global finance, development, and trade.

Audience

Designed for diplomats, international lawyers, policy analysts, development professionals, economists, financial regulators, and graduate students involved in international relations, economic governance, or multilateral negotiations. It is especially relevant for professionals working in or with international financial institutions, trade ministries, or global economic policy bodies.

Instructors

Led by international legal scholars, former officials from the IMF, World Bank, and WTO, trade lawyers, and global governance experts with extensive experience in advising governments, negotiating trade frameworks, and navigating international financial law. Instructors blend legal theory with political economy and real-world negotiation insight.
